BUILDING OF A GREAT RAILROAD

Story of the Chesapcake and Ohio Railroad in Two

CREDIT

TO HUNTINGTON

He It Was, Says Mr. Fontaine, Who Made Final

Extension.

The building of the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad and the beginnings of the enterprise which led to the construction of the present splendid through line from the Chesapeake Bay and the national capital is a subject of peculiar interest just now, for at this very moment negotial to the waters of the Ohio at Cincinnati is a subject of peculiar interest just now, for at this very moment negotial tons are in progress for the settlement of the debt partially incurred in the construction of links in this great railway system. Few who travel in luxurious coaches over the modern Chesapeake and Ohio Railway know the successive stops in the construction of the line, and the names of the men who laid the foundations and made the beginnings.

Much has been written on the subject, and a considerable portion of it has been erroneous or only partially correct. For instance, the Outlook, in its issue of Soptember 3, 1994, printed a communication from James Poyntz Nelson, suggested by a publication in the same paper prior.

instance, the Outlook, in its issue of september 3, 190i, printed a communication from James Poyntz Nelson, suggested by a publication in the same paper prior therete, in which he takes the ground that the railway is "A State Railway," and that no private interests were involved, no capitalists were behind the undertaktor.

Outlook Communication.

Outlook Communication.

In view of the interest in the subject and the information conveyed by Mr. Nelseon, and in order that the erfors in his statement may be corrected, his communication in the Outlook follows:

In a recent letter of your correspondent, L. A.," the Careless Traveler, is a pleasing reference to the Chesapeake and Ohio Rallway that doubtless would have been somewhat differently expressed, though none the less pleasingly, had the writer been informed as to the story of the building of this highway. The story goes back to the days when George Washing ton was a young surveyor in the wilds of the Kanawha region, dreaming with far visions of the time when the waters of the sea would be linked with the beautiful Ohio. The story would tell of war and its fierce strivings after the control of this line of transportation. Then would come the narrative of the historic labors of earnest and patriotic men who, after the war was ended, determined to complete what the Commonwealth of Virighin before its dismemberment had begun. The the war was ended, determined to com-plete what the Commonwealth of Virginia before its dismemberment had begun. The Chesapeake and Ohio Bailway is the heir to the work done by the Board of Public Works of old Virginia.

A Halting Purpose.

Begun in 1836 with a halting purpose "the Louisa Rallroad" crept slowly from old Hanover Junction, where Lee's army and Jackson's men fought off the Federals in later years, to the Jackson's River The State of Virginia on her own accoun-The State of Virginia on her own account built a road through the Blue Ridge Mountains to their western base. The policy of the State to carry the road to the Ohio River was interrupted by the hostillties of 1861. When thus interrupted, 83,000,000 had been expended. The road was a civil of the State, owned by the State, built by the State. No private interest was involved, no "capitalists" were "behind" the undertaking. Or the western portal of the tunnel under the Blue Ridge at Rockfish Gap, a tunnel that engineers the undertaking. Or the western potting of the tunnel under the Blue Ridge at Rockfish Gap, a tunnel that engineers love to call "Crozet's Tunnel," are cut if fitting memorial the names of those who directed the work of construction at that time. To construct a tunnel when the great Crozet was with us was as though we should undertake to penetrate the Alps. Further west in the Alighanies Ellis and Fiske were laying down the hold line that made Huntington, the builder of the road through the Rocky Mountains, wonder. They worked in the day when engineers planned and capital obeyed. It would have been worth the while of your Careless Traveler to have stopped a moment at Jerry's Itun, the largest fill or embankment in the world. One million and a quarter yards of earth and rock were dumped into a chasm one hundred were dumped into a chasm one hundred and seventy-five feet deep.

and seventy-five feet deep.

But to fall to speak of Collis P. Huntington in this connection, would be to fall in simple justice. Through the efforts of General Williams C. Wickham and Judge John B. Baldwin, of Virginia, Mr. Huntington became the master brain that at less brought to fruition the hope of Washington and created the great highway that to-day is crowded with traffic between the Atlantic and the lower fic between the Atlantic and the lower Ohlo waters. He was a builder of cities no less than of railways. The work that he dld in founding places where men might find need of their toll is his greatest monument. Newport News is a tribute to his power.

Mr. Fontaine's Statement.

Commenting upon Mr. Nelson's article and showing his omissions in what pur-ports to be a brief account of the build-and showing his omissions in what purports to be a brief account of the building of the line, the following statement of Mr. R. M. Fontaine, of Charlotteaville, is of especial interest:

Mr. James Poyntz Nelson, in a letter published in the Outlook for September 3, 3991, and headed "A State Railway," telli of the building of the Chesapsake and Ohio Railroad to connect the Ohio River in the Atlantic, and justly gives to Collis P. Huntington the credit for its final extension to its present western terminus. P. Huntington the credit for its final ex-tension to its present western terminus. While referring, however, to the historic labors, of the earnest and patriotic men who, after the war, was ended, determined to complete what the Commonwealth of Virginia before its dismemberment, and begun, Mr. Nelson passes over the equally earnest and patriotic men who before the war, pushed the road as far as Millioro, and he is mistaken in his statement: "the road was the child of the State, owned road was the child of the State, owner, by the State, built by the State."

The road had its beginning in 1836 is an act of the General Assembly of Virginla in corporating the stockholders of the Louisa Railroad for the purpose of

In 1883 an act was passed by the Legislature increasing the capital stock of the company and authorizing the extension of its road to Richmond, but giving to aid from the State in "floating" the necessary bonds or in any other way, and in order to carry on the work, the president, Edmund. Fontaine, proposed to the directors of the company that they should join him they greated the state of the company that they should join him they did: yet, Mr. Nelson tells us that no private interest was involved, no capitalists were belind the undertaking.
